In this case, I immediately understood why Photoshop doesn't support the iPad Pro. The Photoshop Creative Cloud app, when it initially launched, offered a fairly bare-bones function set. In my case, I didn't need a lot of advanced Photoshop features, but I did need a RAW converter to put into Apple's PhotoKit. Adobe has since added much more powerful features, including a swanky new Retouch tool, but as I was learning what it could do, I understood why it would make sense to update features rather than force users to buy into a pricey Creative Cloud plan. There will always be a large (and shrinking) number of Mac users who want to go the Mac way, but fewer and fewer Apple users who want to go the PC way -- and a growing cadre of professionals who have learned to live with the iPad and its apps. I think of the iPad as a killer-app for photography, just as the iPhone is a killer-app for music production, video production, or for personal information management. No, the iPad isn't a NLE like Adobe Premiere -- but where is that ecosystem going? The software industry is starting to realize what Microsoft did when it made Windows 98 the desktop product no one wanted to buy.
